Welcome to Kobe

"[IAFOR] conferences present those taking part with three unique dimensions of experience, encouraging interdisciplinary discussion, facilitating heightened intercultural awareness, and promoting international exchange."

Professor Sue Jackson

Pro-Vice Master for Teaching & Learning, Birkbeck, University of London
IAFOR Executive Council Member

Dear Colleagues,

We are very happy to welcome you to The Sixth Asian Conference on Language Learning 2016, and The Sixth Asian Conference on Technology in the Classroom 2016, in the beautiful city of Kobe, nestled between the mountains and the sea and in the culturally and historically rich Kansai region, which includes neighbouring Osaka, and nearby Kyoto and Nara.

The programme for this conference promises to be an exciting one, with thematic topics that address the central theme of the conference in contrasting but complementary ways, including through papers that draw on empirical research, that develop theoretical and conceptual insights, and that engage with pedagogy, and the experiential. The conference will be enhanced through its wide variety of presenters, who will draw on their diverse experiences and knowledges and on their academic, personal and geographical contexts, in a programme that promises stimulating and challenging discussion.

I would like to thank our university partners from across the world, that help to promote the work of IAFOR, and to announce and welcome our newest partners, the University of Hawaii at Manoa, and Michigan State University, both in the USA.

I would like to thank the Keynote and Featured Speakers, the Conference Chairs, as well as the many people who acted as reviewers for the conference, and in advance, I would also like to thank all of you for your active participation.

We have a lot to learn from each other in this international academic forum, and I look forward to meeting you all.

Warm Regards,

Dr. Joseph Haldane, Ph.D. (London), F.R.S.A., F.R.A.S.
President, IAFOR

Session Chairs are encouraged to introduce themselves and other speakers (briefly) using the provided print-outs of speaker bios, hand out the provided presentation certificates at the end of the session, ensure that the session begins and ends on time, and that the time is divided fairly between the presentations. Each presenter should have no more than 30 minutes in which to present his or her paper, and respond to any questions. Please follow the order in the programme, and if for any reason a presenter fails to show, please keep to the original timeslots as delegates use the programme to plan their attendance.

The Session Chair is asked to assume this timekeeping role, and to this end, a yellow and red timekeeping card is used as a visual cue for presenters, letting them know when they have five minutes remaining, and when they must stop.

Presentation Certificates

Poster Presenters can pick up a certificate of presentation from the Registration Desk. All other presenters will receive a certificate of presentation from their Session Chair or a member of staff at the end of their session.

A Polite Request to All Participants

Participants are requested to arrive in a timely fashion for all presentations, whether to their own, or to those of other presenters. His research and publications cover various aspects of psychology in language learning, with his most recent books being The Psychology of the Language Learner Revisited (co-authored with Zoltán Dörnyei) and Exploring Psychology in Language Learning and Teaching, co-authored with Marion Williams and Sarah Mercer (Oxford University Press).

Keynote Speaker ACLL 2016

Keynote Presentation: Psychology in Language Learning; Diverging Approaches and Converging Goals

In recent years there has been a growing recognition that language teachers require more than simply a knowledge of language and teaching techniques. Language education is not a one-way process and teachers need to be able to understand and to harness the various contributions learners make to their own learning. These contributions are crucially informed by learner psychology, which encompasses the ways in which learners view themselves and their abilities, their motivation for initiating and persisting with learning tasks, their beliefs about how language should be learned and taught, and the range of emotional states encountered throughout the long, and often arduous, language learning experience.

Of course, good teachers already understand psychology—it is a key factor in the various classroom decisions they make—but this understanding often comes at an intuitive level. However, I wish to argue that good practice demands a more systematic knowledge of concepts from educational psychology—such as motivation, identity, and group formation. Fortunately, in the world of language education research, there has been a surge of exciting initiatives exploring diverse aspects of learner psychology and the good news is that we are now witnessing moves to bring these diverse strands of research together to form a practice-oriented resource. In this talk I hope to show some of the ways in which this resource can enable teachers to better understand both their own teaching and the potential within their learners.

Louise Ohashi is an Associate Professor in the School of Global Japanese Studies at Meiji University, Japan. She has been teaching English at university level since 2007, and prior to that she worked within the private language school sector as an English teacher, teacher trainer and Director of Studies. Before settling in Japan, she designed and taught a range of English courses in Australia, England and Italy. She holds a Master of Education (TESOL) and is currently writing her dissertation for a Ph.D. at Charles Sturt University, Australia. Her dissertation examines Japanese students' independent language learning practices, and explores the impact that introducing students to online tools in their formal education can have on what they do outside of class.

Featured Presentation: Improving Language Education with Digital Technology: Tales of Resistance and Encouragement from Japan

Japan is known as a technological leader, famous for its high-speed bullet trains, innovative cars and the multitude of electronic products that have turned brands such as Sony into household names. Given the reputation this country has for its cutting-edge technology, people often assume that the education system is also high-tech. However, the typical high school classroom here only has textbooks and blackboards, with devices such as computers, tablets and smartphones used sparingly, if at all. Due to this, university students tend to have limited experience in using digital technology for language learning when they begin their degree, and for some this does not change much by graduation. There is currently an invisible line between language educators and students who view digital technology as a useful tool for second language acquisition, and those who see it as irrelevant or even detrimental to learning. This creates a dilemma for teachers in terms of best practice. What are teachers to do when their understanding of best practice diverges with those of their colleagues and students? Should those who see value in digital technology reject it to ensure their teaching practices converge with the expectations of those who see it as inappropriate, or should they forge on, researching further in an effort to contribute knowledge that will allow for a deeper understanding of the language-based affordances digital technology can offer? I have chosen to do the latter, so in this presentation I will introduce key insights that I have gained in the last few years through conducting a range of technology-based research projects at Japanese universities. In doing so, I will share statistics and stories that have convinced me that digital technology is an invaluable tool that should be incorporated into formal education to enhance learning opportunities in language classrooms and, even more importantly, outside of them.

James York

Tokyo Denki University, Japan

James is an Assistant Professor at Tokyo Denki University, Japan where he conducts research on the use of games in language learning contexts. He is also a Ph.D. candidate at the University of Leicester (UK). His Ph.D. research is an investigation into the potential of virtual world tasks as a way to improve beginner learners' oral proficiency. The aim of the study is to look for both quantitative and qualitative differences in output when learners complete similar online and offline tasks. The results, then, should help educators be aware of when employing virtual worlds as a domain for language learning. Additionally, James has started research on the application of analog games in the language classroom as part of a wider game-based curriculum. James is also the founder of Kotoba Miners, an online Japanese learning community which uses Minecraft as a domain for teaching.

Featured Presentation: Language Learning in Virtual Worlds: Task Creation and Implementation

Task-based Language Teaching within Computer Assisted Language Learning is a maturing, well-established field of research. There are a number of studies investigating the language learning opportunities and affordances of online games and virtual worlds, where World of Warcraft and Second Life are the two most used domains.

Studies of virtual worlds and language learning predominantly focus on students' text-based interactions. And in addition to this, there is often a focus on how L2 learners interact with native speakers. Although such studies help to highlight the sociocultural aspects of language learning in complex virtual worlds, studies on their value within an L2 classroom are limited. Low-level EFL learners may find that the cognitive load of playing in a Massive Multiplayer Online Role Playing Game's (MMORPG) complex environment hinders their L2 production.

Where learner speaking is focused on, tasks often do not utilise the affordances of the virtual world, or implement particularly open-ended tasks that do not inspire communication between participants.

The aim of this presentation, then, is to:

1. Introduce a number of games and their potential for language learning.
2. Highlight the open-world game Minecraft as a key tool in helping educators develop suitable tasks for learners.
3. Critically evaluate the successful application of such virtual worlds in low-level, monolingual, EFL contexts.

She is a part-time faculty member on the Doctor of Education programme in TESOL at the University of Anaheim (USA), an occasional supervisor at the university of Birmingham (UK) on the MATESOL programme, and an advisor to doctoral candidates at the Education and ICT programme at the Open University of Catalunya (Spain). (2012). She recently co-authored a book (with Satoko Kato) on reflective dialogue / advising which was published by Routledge (New York) in August 2015. She has been the editor of SiSAL (Studies in Self-Access Learning) Journal –a peer review, open access publication– since 2010.

Featured Presentation: Convergence and Research in Technology-supported Self-directed Language Learning (SDLL)

Most learning takes place outside the classroom (Benson & Reinders, 2011; Reinders & Benson, forthcoming), and as educators we have a responsibility to help our learners to develop an awareness of and capacity to take charge of their own language learning. Technology could now be argued to have a mostly normalised role (Bax, 2003) in providing learners with opportunities to study and practice a target language. However, we still have much to learn about the role that technology might play in helping learners to manage their own learning and to become autonomous and self-directed language learners. I will briefly outline what is meant by self-directed language learning SDLL and what skills are needed in order for learners to be able to develop a capacity for lifelong learner autonomy (Benson, 2011). I will then take a look at ways in which learners can draw upon technology tools in order to combine language study, language practice, and learning self-management to reach their language goals. In order for us to achieve true convergence, more research into technology-supported SDLL is needed. Drawing on an ongoing action research project at my own institution where my colleagues and I have produced, implemented, and are currently evaluating a custom-made app for managing self-directed language learning, I will introduce a model for researching and evaluating the effectiveness of technology-supported SDLL.

Featured Presentation: Enhancing Learner Autonomy in Japan Through Teachers' Professional Development

Learner autonomy, commonly defined as learners taking responsibility for their own learning, is believed to improve motivation, engagement, and overall academic performance. However, the appropriateness of the concept has been contested in Asia, and the practices used for developing autonomy are considered to be highly contextualized. In Japan, the obstacles to developing learner autonomy, including individual learners' past educational experiences and institutional goals that are often highly exam focused, are often seen as insurmountable. On the contrary, the findings of the current study suggest that there are areas in which improvement can be realized. This paper investigates instructor views on their students' readiness for autonomy, the practices used for developing learner autonomy, and the constraints on promoting learner autonomy at a private university in Tokyo, Japan. The presenter will report on data collected from English language and content university instructors as they discussed, reflected on, and attempted to promote learner autonomy through a series of workshops, surveys, interviews, and curriculum development over two semesters. The results provide strategies to overcome obstacles and outlines for enhancing learner autonomy in Japan. As one component of a pan-Asia research project, the current study provides points of comparison with other Asian contexts. This paper, together with these regional studies, can contribute to an overall theory of learner autonomy in Asia.

ABOUT IAFOR

The International Academic Forum

Academic Vision and Mission

“To Open Minds, To Educate Intelligence, To Inform Decisions”

The vision of IAFOR grew out of the perceived need to fill a vacuum in the communication and exchange activities of the academic world. Its mission arose out of examining that space and investigating why it existed. The vacuum existed because of the lack of opportunity for serious and thoughtful exchange between academics, members of the global business community, and practitioners in the fields of human endeavor that linked these groups together. In the field of education, for example, we have academic theorists, educational managers (political decision-makers and organisational directors) and classroom teachers with their support staff in IT, library work, exchange programmes, and specialist fields. But how often do they have the opportunity to interact?

Moving beyond one particular field, larger questions arise. What function should universities prioritise in the 21st century? What do businesses see as their contribution to social and global well-being? How can people on the ground, trying to implement improvements that will transform human life, best be supported? And perhaps above all, what are the agendas that will drive mechanisms to enable these groups to interact effectively.

One piece of distilled thought that came from early exchanges at one of our conferences was the recognition that some of the rhetoric of concern about the problems of developing nations was perhaps over-focused on the term “poverty” because it can be defined only in a relative way. “Hunger” was put forward as being more immediate and itself a contributory factor to poverty, rather than the other way round. One key to the hunger issue could be the provision of safe drinking water; or water for irrigation in some contexts, while flood management might be necessary elsewhere. These, in and by themselves become valuable only insofar as they help to relieve hunger in specific contexts.

IAFOR is affording opportunities that do not exist elsewhere. The base is Kansai, Japan’s great commercial and manufacturing hub, one symbol of the emerging Pacific economy that is already eclipsing the long dominant Atlantic zone. Our conferences present those taking part with three unique dimensions of experience. First of all, they encourage interdisciplinary activity to be expanded. Depending on the field, this can face varying degrees of difficulty, ranging from discouragement to downright prohibition. Those overly dependent on fixed academic structures often see lateral thinking as a threat. None of these negatives apply in IAFOR. Its purpose is to generate new approaches that cross any disciplinary lines. The principle employed is to let the imagination permit intuitive responses to questions. There are no panels of critics. There are simply people who want to listen and reflect. The model of academic work as potholing is replaced by the metaphor of mountaineering. While respecting the need for solid and well-founded academic work, we feel the need to go beyond it from time to time to discover fresh approaches to old questions.

Secondly, it facilitates the heightening of intercultural awareness. Again, we encourage innovation through cross-cultural perception. Cultural roots influence people in their attitudes more than most would realise or admit. The need to see and internalise insights gained from other viewpoints is met by a process of steady illumination.

Thirdly, it promotes the broadening of international exchange. We may live in a world, but in reality parochialism still holds sway. The collapse of the U.S.S.R and the break-up of Yugoslavia led to the re-establishment of numerous former countries. While this may be desirable for the peoples concerned, it merely adds to the world’s cultural confusion. Exchange leads to explanation and that helps the growth of intercultural awareness.

IAFOR makes all of these developments possible in one gathering. Our conferences are not a substitute for specialist conferences. We intend our events to be an alternative that functions as a balance or even a corrective to the extreme tendencies that can arise from more narrowly defined research parameters. In short, IAFOR is promoting and facilitating a new multifaceted approach to one of the core issues of our time, namely globalisation and its many forms of growth and expansion. Awareness of how it cuts across the worlds of business, and academia, along with its impact on societies and institutions is one of the driving forces that has given the organisation its momentum, and is making it a pioneer in this global age.

IAFOR Journals

The International Academic Forum's Journals conform to the highest academic standards of international peer review, and are published in accordance with the IAFOR publishing commitment to make all of our published materials available online.

How are Journal Editors appointed?

Journal Editors are appointed by The International Academic Forum's leadership, under the guidance of the Chairman of the International Advisory Board. The term of appointment is for one issue, to be renewed by mutual consent.

How do we ensure academic integrity?

Once appointed, the editor is free to appoint his or her own editorial team and advisory members. All papers published in the journal have been subjected to the rigorous and accepted processes of academic peer review. Neither editors nor members of the editorial team are remunerated for their work. Authors will never be asked to "contribute" towards publication costs.

How are papers selected?

Journal Editors may accept papers through an open call, and proposed articles may be sent directly to the respective editors. A small number of papers from the associated IAFOR Conference Proceedings may also be selected by the journal editor(s) for reworking and revising, subject to normal processes of review. It is expected that between five and ten percent of papers included in any given Conference Proceedings will be developed for inclusion in the associated conference journal.

How are IAFOR Journals related to IAFOR conferences?

IAFOR's journals reflect the interdisciplinary and international nature of our conferences and are organised thematically. Papers included in the associated Conference Proceedings may be considered for reworking by the editor(s), and are then subjected to the same processes of peer review as papers submitted by other means.

Sake, or nihonshu, is the national drink of Japan, enjoyed all over the country – casually over yakitori, or to celebrate New Year and traditional Shinto weddings. During this tasting we will try artisanal brews made by hand and served lightly chilled. There will be a short presentation to give you the basics of sake brewing and enjoyment, followed by a tasting session and a short tasting test. Join us to learn about this aspect of Japanese cuisine and culture.
